Q: How has this project been designed to conserve resources?

A: What you may not recognize when you visit The Wave is that it is built to be a green facility. The Wave was designed to meet Leadership in Energy & Environmental Design (LEED) Silver standards. The City of Dublin has taken many steps toward minimizing the environmental impact of this facility. These steps include using solar energy to heat the water in the Natatorium pool, LED lighting throughout the facility, a storm water filtering system, variable speed motors for the pool circulation equipment, drought-tolerant landscaping, state-of-the-art irrigation system and the infrastructure to install up to 10 electric vehicle charging stations. In addition to reaching LEED Silver status, there are many energy- and water-conserving features to ensure efficient operations.

Even the roof in the Natatorium, or indoor pool, is state of the art. The innovative material used is a transparent polymer which transmits more light, provides better insulation and is only 1/100th the weight of glass.
